

128 Dorrance Street, Suite 400
Providence, RI 02903
Phone: (401) 831-7171
Fax: (401) 831-7175
www.riaclu.org
info@riaclu.org

ACLU OF RI POSITION: OPPOSE

TESTIMONY ON 26-S 2957, RELATING TO CRIMINAL OFFENSES – THREATS AND EXTORTION April 2, 2026

This bill would make it a felony with a potential sentence of up to five years in prison for an individual to threaten any school employee with physical harm. We urge rejection of this bill.

We wish to begin by emphasizing that the ACLU of Rhode Island fully appreciates the concerns prompting this bill. We also agree that “true threats” have long been held not to be protected by the First Amendment and should be prosecuted. However, we believe the penalties in this legislation are unduly harsh, the law’s current wording raises free speech concerns in light of its breadth, and the likely effect of the bill’s implementation will be to coerce people to plea bargain even in instances when their conduct might not be illegal. We are especially concerned about the bill’s impact when applied to parents who say unintended things in the heat of the moment; little is gained by breaking up a family when an irate father makes comments that are way out of line but that are not legitimate threats. We briefly summarize our concerns below:

1. The law, as it is currently worded, raises serious constitutional concerns. At a minimum, it should be fixed before any consideration of expanding its reach is considered. As written, the law makes criminal a wide variety of hyperbolic comments that may be expressed by people in the heat of the moment and that would not be seen as true threats. The First Amendment requires that any such statute be narrowly drawn in order to prevent vast prosecutorial overreach.<sup>1</sup>

While the government can prosecute someone who intentionally threatens another person with serious bodily harm, and whose words are reasonably perceived as threatening, the current law makes it a felony to make any threat of bodily harm, regardless of whether it could reasonably be perceived as threatening and regardless of the speaker’s intent. It thus makes felons out of people who – whether in the throes of anger, passion, or drunkenness – make threats that nobody would take seriously and that are of a type uttered by people literally thousands of times a day. The law’s broad language gives enormous and arbitrary authority to law enforcement to arrest individuals for rhetorical excesses. Obviously, the more people that the law provides protection to from “threats,” the greater the potential for its misuse.

2. We also have concerns about the felony penalties associated with the crime. For many years, the ACLU has been critical of the felonization of criminal conduct and its impact on the criminal justice system and efforts to stem the problem of mass incarceration. This particular conduct may deserve punishment, but does it warrant five years in prison and the consequences that flow from a felony record? In most instances, misdemeanor assault penalties would be more than sufficient to address the harm. In recent years, this committee has done much to address the problem of mass incarceration. It is essential to think twice before enacting more laws that create new felonies or expand the reach of existing ones.

---

<sup>1</sup> The U.S. Supreme Court has held that, to convict a person of making true threats, a state must show that the speaker had a subjective understanding as to whether the person to whom his words were directed would perceive them as threatening. Counterman v. Colorado, 600 U.S. 66 (2023).

3. We believe the seriousness of the penalty plays out in a troubling manner in another way. Passage of a bill like this will likely only provide the state a tool to engage in “charge stacking” – i.e., charging people with both this felony and a misdemeanor offense – and to coerce individuals into pleading guilty to the lesser offense, even if they have a good defense, due to the fears emanating from the ramifications of a felony conviction.

4. As the statute governing felony threats expands to include more occupations and professions within its scope, the pressure will be inevitable to add others. Especially in the polarized times we live in, all manner of occupations are under siege to a greater or lesser extent. If outbursts against school principals deserve felony penalties, why not the same penalties on behalf of tax collectors, meter attendants, customer service representatives, individuals providing abortion services, and on and on?

Finally, we acknowledge that the bill contains a carve-out so that individuals under the age of 18 cannot be charged under this law. While we appreciate this effort to protect young people from the harshness of the legislation, it fails to address the larger flaws in the bill that are described above, and would still ensnare the subset of young eighteen-year-olds who are still in school.

In sum, true threats deserve punishment. But broadly worded laws that criminalize a wide array of protected speech and carry extremely harsh penalties should not be further expanded. Current criminal laws already provide appropriate penalties. For all these reasons, while sympathetic to its origins, the ACLU opposes this bill.