

ACLU OF RI POSITION: SUPPORT

TESTIMONY ON 26-H 7652,
RELATING TO CRIMINAL PROCEDURE – SENTENCE AND EXECUTION
April 2, 2026

The ACLU of Rhode Island is strongly supportive of this legislation, which would require the consideration of the status of a defendant as a parent at their sentencing, and allow for the presentation of a “family impact statement” as a component of the sentencing process. This bill is compassionate in its recognition not only that a strong familial structure encourages rehabilitation and prevents recidivism, but that instituting the procedures contained in the legislation can prevent the harmful, reverberating effects that incarceration has on both the incarcerated individual and their children and family members.

It is worth noting that nationwide, “nearly half (47%) of the approximately 1.25 million people in state prison are parents of minor children, and about 1 in 5 (19%) of those children is age 4 or younger,” and that research has indicated that “children of incarcerated parents face formidable cognitive and health-related challenges throughout their development.” Additionally, the impact of being an incarcerated parent is more likely to affect incarcerated women rather than men.¹

The incarceration of a parent, regardless of how long it is for, can uproot a child’s life, causing unpredictable changes in housing and education, and severely limit the access a child has to the important emotional support that a parent provides. On the flipside, being separated from one’s child obviously causes a parent turmoil and anguish. Cognizant of these effects and the fact that familial relationships are complex, this legislation permits the use of a “family impact statement” in examining the defendant’s role as a parent. This acknowledges the impact the separation would have on family and community members who may be left to assume responsibilities left by parents.

In short, this bill recognizes the severe impact that incarceration can have on the family structure and allows courts to take into account the harm that familial separation by way of incarceration can inflict on both the justice-involved individual and their children, family members, or caregivers. In doing so, however, it still leaves it within the complete discretion of the court – with input from victims –whether to reduce a sentence for any given offender. For all these reasons, we urge support for this legislation.
